

Letter from Mr. Mao Yushi

Mr. Wu Yisan:

Thank you for your letter.

There are three rightists in our Mao family. I am one, and there are two sons south of The Great Fang Mao, Mao Yugong, Mao Yurong is also a rightist. South of Mao is the mao family's big house, Mao Yisheng is a second room, my father Mao Yixin is a five-room, and the middle two died prematurely.

Mao Yugong returned from the United States before liberation. After earning his degree in the United States, he opened a factory called China Motor. But it was not successful, so it was closed to return home. He has extensive experience in automobile manufacturing. Therefore, if china wants to develop the automobile industry after liberation, we asked him to take up a post at the Changchun Automobile Factory.

However, the importance attached to Soviet experts at that time was not reused. In 1957, when he opposed the right, he was classified as a rightist and transferred to the Luoyang Tractor Factory. He was beaten during the Cultural Revolution. Later, he rushed back to the countryside in northern Jiangsu and lived extremely difficultly. It was Mao Yisheng who gave them relief and survived difficulties. After being rehabilitated, he became a member of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (Yangzhou City is still from the whole country, I don't remember). After that, the family gradually moved to the United States, and the children were employed in the United States. He had four children, the eldest was a man, and the following were girls. Several children are currently returning to China to develop. All successful. Mao Yugong died three or four years ago.

Mao Yurong studied law and has always been politically unable to align himself with the party. He was classified as a rightist during the Cultural Revolution and imprisoned for about ten years. And he was handcuffed and tortured. After his rehabilitation, he taught law at Xi'an Highway College and was a professor at the school. He died four or five years ago.
